Abstract

Started from Beijing making its two Olympic bids during 1991 and 2001, China faced many criticisms from all over the world because of the poor human rights records. The concept of realism emphasizes on the realities in the international relations, so the Chinese government needs to improve its international image on human rights issues under the pressure of the public and the press. From past to now, China changed its attitude toward human right step by step. Especially after China got the ticket to hold the Olympics, the Chinese government was dedicated to revising the law and loosening the press freedom. However, even though China promulgated two new measures to loosen the restrictions for foreign journalists during the Beijing Olympics, and made them become permanent, journalists still are not allowed to travel to the restricted region of Tibet and other areas without getting special permission of local authorities. Moreover, this new regulation hasn't extended to Chinese own journalists. The limit and difference within those given right between the Chinese journalists and foreign ones represent that China still protects its political interests to make a stable internal political circumstance. Under the trend globalization, China is forced to compromise, but it still holds tightly on its self-interest. As we can see from the Chinese policy, China has only improved its human rights conditions temporary due to the Olympics.
